

Finding Fredenborg

Every place named beside Fredenborg in the Jerslev register and the 1676 herred court records can be put on a map. Fredenborg itself cannot, yet. The 1676 records pull two ways, so the map carries two candidate zones and the evidence for each.

Where the evidence sits

Background: your Google Maps satellite screenshot, georeferenced by fitting 28 labelled towns and the Trøgdrupvej pin to their OpenStreetMap coordinates. Fit error is about 9 px RMS, 21 px worst case, which is roughly 100 to 230 m on the ground. The imagery is Google's and is here for private research use. Parish outlines are modern (DAGI, simplified) and sit close to the 1698 boundaries. Farms recorded only as a surviving road name are placed on that road. The two Trøgdrup villages are placed from Trøgdrupvej and Klausholm and are approximate. No distance on this page comes from a document; all are measured between modern coordinates. Hover a point for its evidence.

Reading the overlap

Each event is drawn as the ground it constrains. The hatched disc is the area a household involved in that event would plausibly live in; the solid core is where the event itself happened.

- 31 Aug 1676, the tithe. Core: Jerslev mark, the village's open field, drawn as 1.8 km around the church. Disc: that field plus one night's wagon haul, 3 km.
- 7 Sep 1676, Bløden. Core: the common between Nørre and Sønder Trøgdrup, drawn as a strip between the two approximate village sites. Disc: the 2.5 km within which users of a village common lived.
- 13 Feb 1698, the baptism. Disc: 4.5 km around Kolskegård, the one godparent home

- 15 Feb 1699, the baptism. Disc: 4.0 km around Kølskegård, the one godparent home outside the parsonage. The dotted outline is Jerslev parish, the hard constraint, since the child was baptised at Jerslev church.

Where they meet. The tithe disc, the Kølskegård disc and the parish outline share one region: the southern half of Jerslev’s fields, between the church and Svennum, roughly 57.26 to 57.285 N and 10.08 to 10.13 E. That is the best-guess ground. The Bløden disc touches none of the others, which is the honest picture: the two 1676 events cannot both be at Fredenborg’s doorstep. One of them records Fredenborg’s men acting on land away from home, and the baptism says the home was in Jerslev parish.

All radii are working assumptions, not measurements from any document. Switch layers off above to test a different reading.

Zone A · a house in Jerslev’s fields

For. On 31 Aug 1676 the priest’s farmhand went to collect the tithe on Kirsten Jensdatter’s field on Jerslev mark. Anders of Fredenborg drove him off with a wagon stake and carted the grain away that night. In October the court told Anders to prove his title to the grain, so he was claiming the crop as his own: he was farming a strip in Jerslev’s open field. Only village households held strips there, and a night’s haul by wagon is short work. Twenty-two years later the Fredenborg family baptised a child in Jerslev church, with the priest’s wife as godmother, which is what a Jerslev-parish household would do.

Against. A man could farm his mother’s or mother-in-law’s strips in Jerslev while living elsewhere, and the parsonage circle would stand godparent to anyone in the pastorate.

Zone B · a holding on the Sønder Trøgdrup side

For. The 1676 Trøgdrup entries are one feud. Christen Mortensen of Klausholm, who is also written “i sdr Trøgdrup”, fought Jens Nielsen and the Nørre Trøgdrup tenants over the common called Bløden between the two villages. On 7 Sep 1676 the Nørre Trøgdrup side summoned its opponents to hear testimony, and the list reads “Peder Andersen i Fredenborg, Christen Mortensen i Klausholm, Peder Andersen i Allerup and others”. Fredenborg is named first among the Sønder Trøgdrup party. People summoned over a common were normally those using it, and users of a village common lived at that village.

Against. Trøgdrup is in Hellevad parish, which had its own church and priest, and its registers run from 1646. A Hellevad household would baptise at Hellevad, not 10 km away at Jerslev. Peder Andersen may instead have held a Sønder Trøgdrup farm from a distance, or be a different man from the Fredenborg of the tithe case.

What decides between them

1. Hellevad’s parish register, 1646 onward. If “Fredenborg” appears in Hellevad baptisms or burials in the 1670s to 1690s, zone B wins. If it never does while Jerslev’s register keeps using it, zone A wins. This is the cheapest test and the most decisive.
2. Christian V’s 1688 matrikel for both Jerslev and Hellevad sogne. It lists every taxed holding by village and names the tenant. Look for Anders, Peder Andersen or the place name under Jerslev by and under Sønder Trøgdrup.
3. The enclosure and Original 1 cadastral maps (c. 1790–1810) for Jerslev ejerlav and for Trøgdrup, at Geodatastyrelsen’s historical map archive. They label houses by name.
4. Later Jerslev register entries “udj Fredenborg”. Godparents drawn from Svennum and Hjulskov point to A; godparents from Hellum or Hellevad point to B.
